OPTION X: HOW PLASTIC BECAME A VICTIM OF ITS OWN SUCCESS

- 1 Leo Baekeland produced the first fully synthetic plastic, which he called Bakelite. He said about it, "This invention
2 will prove important in the future." Baekeland made his first fortune in his thirties by selling his photographic printing
3 business to Kodak. On his invention of Bakelite, he became so rich and famous that Time magazine put his face on 4 the cover without needing to mention his name, just the words "It will not burn or melt," in reference to the amazing
5 properties of his plastic.
6 Earlier plastics were based on plants, and Baekeland himself had been seeking an alternative to shellac, a resin
7 secreted by beetles that was used for electrical insulation. Yet he quickly realised that Bakelite could become far 8 more versatile than that. In the 1920s and 1930s, different kinds of plastic poured out of labs around the world. As 9 World War Two made natural resources scarce, production of plastics dramatically increased to fill the gap. After the 10 war, exciting new products like Tupperware hit the consumer market.
11 However, plastic would not remain exciting for long: from originally meaning modernity, it now stands for cheap
12 stuff. Lately it has become synonymous with environmental problems. The long lifecycle of chemical-loaded plastics, 13 which affect animal development and reproduction, poses a problem for the environment. However, plastic has 14 benefits that aren't just economic, but eco-friendly too. Vehicles made with plastic parts are lighter, and so use less 15 fuel. Transportation of plastic-contained goods is also lighter, and thus greener. Plastic packaging keeps food fresh
16 for longer, reducing waste. It is no wonder that scientists are trying to improve ways of recycling and reusing plastics 17 – the material once considered a miracle product.
